Q: Do I need to schedule maintenance to keep my warranty valid?

The short answer is yes. Even extended warranties require proof of maintenance.

Q: How do I know if my HVAC system is sized correctly?

Buy a system too large for your home, and it will cycle frequently. A system too small for your home will struggle to keep your home comfortable. In either case, you will pay more in energy bills than necessary.

Heating and cooling systems need to fit your home like a glove. Our certified technicians will take accurate load measurements to ensure your system fits the square footage and design of your home.

Q: What are the new refrigerant standards for AC units?

Was your central air conditioner installed before 2010? If so, it likely uses a refrigerant called R-22.

In 2020, the United States phased out the R-22 because of environmental reasons. That means its supply is limited because only stockpiled or reclaimed R-22 is allowed for use in air conditioning units. It is costly to replace.

R-22 was replaced by another refrigerant called R-410A. The U.S. also plans to start phasing down R-410A over the next decade. But unlike R-22, R-410A will be in abundant supply for years and years to come.

What's this mean to you? Now is the perfect time to replace your aging air conditioner—especially if it was installed around 2010. There is a plentiful supply of available R-410A, and you will enjoy significant cost savings on your energy bills by upgrading to a new system.
